“W hooooo ate the riddle?!” Everyone looked at Mouse. Owl made a new rule: “OK, no more eating the riddles, starting...now.” Everyone nodded in agreement. “Now we have to find the second clue without the first clue, which will be much harder.”

Just then Mouse’s tummy started rumbling. Bear gently picked Mouse up and began to pat him on the back. After a few pats and a tiny “bwep,” Mouse was holding the first clue again. “Mouse burped the clue! We knew you had it in you!” Everyone was very proud of Mouse. “Read it! Read it!”

Berry good! But watch your paws, the next clue comes with scratchy claws.

“Oh, scratchy claws. I get it! Follow me.” With Fox leading the way, the five friends ventured until they reached the bramble of snowberry bushes by the pond.

Fox disappeared into the maze of thorns, parkouring around the spiky tangles. When she returned, she was carrying a pair of binoculars and a handkerchief full of snowberries.

“Fox! How did you...?” Mouse squeaked. Fox smiled, “This is my me-place, where I come to meditate. I thought I was the only one who knew about it.”

There was a note taped to Fox’s back. “Another clue!” said Owl. “Don’t eat it,” said Bear. “Read it, read it!” said Raccoon.

Giant trees make it hard to see. If you need help, just ask Marie.

“Marie? Marie who?” asked Owl. Raccoon blushed, “It’s my middle name. I didn’t know anyone knew that.”

“That is a lovely middle name,” stated Bear. Everyone agreed that it was a lovely middle name. As they continued deep into the forest, the clue started to make more sense.

“Raccoon, you have night vision. Can you lead? It’s too dark to read our map, and I’m in charge of the binoculars!” Owl hooted.

Raccoon led the friends carefully through the forest in a single file line, with each friend holding on to the tail of the friend in front of them, so they wouldn’t get separated. Owl flew above, peering through the binoculars. Raccoon stopped suddenly, causing everyone to bump into each other.

“Oof!” “Ack!” “Screech!” “Gasp.”

They had come to a skinny wooden bridge stretching across a zigzagging canyon that went waaayyy down. A wooden sign next to the bridge read:

Trust your friends, feel the beat. Share your gift of dancing feet.

Fox looked worried. “Oh, this is the Dancing Bridge. It’s totally magical. You have to dance across. Or it makes sad noises.”

“With no music?!” hooted Owl. “Follow me,” said Bear as she started swinging her hips and tapping her toes along to the funky music in her heart. All of a sudden the other animals started to hear the song too! Mouse pulled out his silver-stringed ukelele and plucked along.

And then, they danced. Before the animals knew what was happening, they were on the other side of the bridge. Bear took an enormous bow, knocking them all onto the ground. “Did we fall?” one of them asked. “No, we danced,” Bear smiled.

The bridge had led them to the marshy spot next to the cove, where a rowboat was waiting for them. They hopped in and shoved off into the water. All of a sudden, a small, muffled, slow clap started from somewhere in the distance. Like someone clapping with small furry gloves on. “Wait,” Fox sniffed the air, “I know that smell.”

The clapping became louder and louder until Otter floated into the moonlight, revealing himself. “OTTER! We definitely probably ought’ve known it was you,” laughed Fox.

“That was tricky! How did you know we could solve those clues?” chirped Owl.

“Yeah, how did you know I knew how to dance?” Bear asked.

“Ah, allow me to answer your riddle with a riddle...” Otter replied.

What’s better than cake, or catching a star? Showing your friends how wonderful they are.

“Oh, I like that one. It has the answer in it,” Mouse chuckled.

Otter began handing bowls of his famous clam chowder to all of his friends. “This is the best part!” Raccoon clapped excitedly. “No, this is,” Bear smiled. She pulled everyone into a big warm bear hug that smelled of snowberries, clam chowder and friendship, and lasted until spring.
