Like finding the right person to marry, finding the right mattress is a challenging, and fun, process that can change your life forever. Mattresses come in a variety of options and finding the right one relies heavily on your personal preferences, but there are some general guidelines to follow based on sleep style. Side sleepers benefit most from the soft and contouring comfort of a plush mattress, while stomach sleepers need the solid support a firmer mattress offers. And back sleepers can usually sleep the night away on whatever mattress they find most comfortable. What is the difference between all foam, spring and hybrid mattresses

This is like asking us to sum up our life's work in two sentences, but luckily for you, we feel up to the challenge. Buckle up. When you think of how a mattress feels, your mind usually conjures up the feel of a traditional innerspring mattress. This is the mattress you probably slept on as a kid. It has a bouncy feel that inspires jumping on the bed and provides solid support with a generally plush feel. On the other hand, solid foam mattresses combine different layers of foam to create a generally denser and firmer feeling mattress. These mattresses usually incorporate memory foam to create a plush surface layer. Hybrid mattresses combine the best of the spring and foam worlds to create a soft, supportive, and durable mattress that can be generally sorted into the medium-firm wheelhouse. Hybrids are incredibly versatile, though, and are becoming more and more popular.

How do I soften a mattress that is too firm for me?

We know this probably isn't the answer you want to hear, but if your mattress is too firm, you should eventually get a new one. In the meantime, though, a topper is a quick and affordable way to add the softness you're looking for. Add a 2, 3, or 4-inch memory foam topper depending on just how plush you like it. Added bonus, memory foam provides great pressure point relief. Just remember, the thicker the topper, the plusher the feel.
